| China and World History. This course challenges the view that traditional China was isolated and scarcely had relations with foreign lands. China had significant relations with the Xiongnu (known as the Huns in Europe), India (from which it learned about Buddhism), and the Middle East (from which it learned about Islam), the Mongols (from whom they had first exposure to Europe (through Marco Polo and other travelers) and Japan, Korea, and Southeast Asia (over which it had considerable influence). Via the Silk Route, it conducted trade, but also influenced and was influenced by Middle Eastern and European cultural developments. Finally, from the sixteenth century, China interacted, positively and negatively with Europe. The course ends with a consideration of U.S.-China relations. | | | | |

The Immigration Act of 1965: American Dreams and Distortions. This course asks students to assume the role of policy advisors before 1965 and grapple with different options for how a new immigration system could be designed. As students investigate the cultural, historical, economic, and political context of the time, their writing assignments will wrestle with and weigh possible answers to the question: What would a fair immigration system look like? We will also consider US immigration policy from 1965 to 2025.

Machiavelli, Erasmus, and Other Classics of Renaissance Humanism. Humanist writers posed questions and offered solutions to problems in their times that remain highly relevant to our world today. They posited new norms about human nature and behavior, community and politics, power and authority. Their writings reflected new senses of individual identity, agency, and obligation to guide our quest to live a purposeful life. You will take up some of these questions in collaborative online discussions, reading worksheets, individual essays, and a final exam. While our course is not a history of Renaissance Europe, some understanding of that history is essential for you to understand our humanist authors. Our class is asynchronous, which means there are no class meetings online or in person. Instead, the course is designed for you to pursue the work independently.

Examination of contemporary and historical cultural production on and from Africa across a range of registers, including literary, musical and visual arts, material culture, and science and technology. We employ key concepts from history, anthropology, political science, psychology, sociology, literature, and social theory to analyze these forms and phenomena, and help to both situate contemporary cultural production and to interrogate the future directions of African being in the world. Anchoring our discussions in case studies, we consider how Africa's place in and relationship to the global is articulated through creative practices. The course shows creative cultures and cultural production as not only aesthetic or functional, but also thoroughly political. We explore cases from throughout the continent.
